

Sometimes life is not so black and white, especially in the classroom. Here is the story of a teacher whose story has gone viral, and she's getting a backlash for what she believed was a good deed. You decide!

The Summary:

- 1) Teacher braids her student's "ridiculously tangled" hair
- 2) She takes a picture and places it on Facebook... and the post goes viral
- 3) The public reactions are mixed, to say the least!

The storyline: A teacher has stirred up a bit of controversy by braiding one of her student's wild hair in an effort to make it more presentable. She even had the permission of the parents. So why could anyone be upset by this good deed? The problem is that she posted the event on Facebook, along with a photo that went viral. While some people appreciate the kind act, others are accusing the teacher of overstepping boundaries and then bragging about her actions via social media. Was she out of line? You decide.

The teacher's Facebook comment about the picture:

"So one of my students came to school today with her hair full of knots, lent, and ridiculously tangled. It looked like it hadn't been touched the entire holiday break...so my classroom became a salon. The photo on the left is before, and the right after. It just broke my heart so badly that I refused to let her leave school today the same way she came. When I finished she looked at herself and said "aww so pretty"...the beauty is that she is normally non-verbal. So now I'm crying lol. My day has been made!"
